The speaker's journey to his job in digital forensics was very interesting to me since it shows a very good perspective of not being scared to be open for new opportunities. Starting off as an accountant, something he never thought he would do was pursuing a career in forensics; however, he had a passion for computers that inspired him to assume IT role at his accounting office. Despite the fact that he wasn't entirely sure what this job opportunity consisted of, when one of the biggest companies offered him a chance to join Australia's first national digital forensic practice, he took this opportunity instantly. I like how he acknowledged his experience, without having no type of education that motivated him, and this is what actually helped him learn new knowledge from his experience. His story made me realize that it is no perfect way for your intended career and that sometimes opportunities aren't planned how you want them to find you. I also acknowledge the work he does when no one's looking to reveal the truth and his very protectiveness on keeping evidence safe.
