

Why am I interested in cybersecurity technology? I would have to say because I have always been a person who was interested in anything technological. In one of my earliest memories with technology, I always wanted to figure out how it came to be that we built skyscrapers, vehicles, and computers out of what you would see if you were to go outside. Another reason I say got me into liking technology was that I didn't have too much exposure to it as a kid. My main focus was going outside, riding my bike, or seeing what my friends were up to in the neighborhood. But when I got my first computer, I remember this annoying lock that my parents put on it. This lock prevented me from going on this site called. "Y8" it was a gaming site that, at the time, was kind of out there for violence and things you did not want your child to be on, but to me, it was so cool. So, to get past the parental controls, I turned it off; it wasn't cuz I hacked the system or anything like that. I had just figured out the password; that had to be my first thought of how easy it was to bypass security, then I did the same thing with my DirectTV bedtime. It would always be 9:00 pm that I had to go to sleep, but as a child, I could not get to sleep, so I'd just be staring at my TV with the bar on the side saying input the code. That gave me time to think, "What was the code? How could I know the code? It's simple what do you know" were all questions I asked until I just tried a string of random numbers and cracked it.
