society's response to act of evil and enforces the idea that crime has a purpose beyond simply just punishing criminals for their deeds. Law creates a societal code in which every person within society must follow to maintain harmony within society. Another interesting point is how all these laws are different, but they still definitely bleed into each other. Morality is deciding what is crime and what is not, but it plays a role. Law is created by society, so for example speeding laws are made to avoid vehicle accidents or potential death to people involved. This protects society but sometimes leads to killing someone (Although not on purpose). I think the classification of crime is the most compelling factor of criminal justice, because it is an issue of philosophy. It brings questions such as why do laws exist to keep population in control? Or is it to protect the members of society from one group over another? Another thing about crime is two people committing the same crime with completely different punishments, is that justice? I am very excited as this is a very strong start that made me question everything about the nature itself. The media and crime reporters only muddy the details.
