

Week 7 Journal Entry

Review the following ten photos through a human-centered cybersecurity framework. Create a meme for your favorite three, explaining what is going on in the individual's or individuals' mind(s).

I'm not sure if it is going to necessarily be human cybersecurity centered, but I'll try. I could boil down all the images into one text meme. The text is "grinding metal". Back in the 80s, people had a love for music, metal instruments, as it provided, and still provides, a form of emotional security. Individuals can write music and lyrics to express their feelings, and that music is appreciated, and artists are typically treated with a certain level of respect. The internet in contrast isn't really a place that provides such emotional security, and nowadays, "grinding metal", whether it be a laptop or smartphone or tablet, is a source for great amounts of emotional insecurity, whether it be through something drastic like identity theft where one shared too much information, or something simpler like being berated on a social media platform for sharing thoughts and feelings on a topic or subject of a multitude of possible varieties.
