

In the website PrivacyRights.org, there is a lot of public information about data breaches. There are graphs showing different types of data breaches, the location of said data breaches, and even reports/articles. It is also very informative about various laws and acts that help protect people against data breaches. Researchers may use these resources to maybe collect data on how many data breaches there have been over the years. There are also survey results about laws, regulations, and various topics related to data breaches. The website seems to also help explain broad/complex data privacy laws to the reader in a much simpler matter. Overall, this website looks to have proper resources for researching data breaches and can be helpful when tackling data privacy laws.