Reflection 1

Throughout the first 50 hours of my internship at ManTech, I have done the standard beginning of a job. I went to an Intern Kickoff event at ManTech headquarters, in which I was introduced to my recruiter properly. This event consisted of getting all the interns up to speed about what kind of events we would be going to throughout the summer, as well as some of the other benefits we will be getting as interns, such as holiday pay and flex scheduling. Once I actually started working, I had to do the standard beginning tasks, such as basic training courses through ManTech University, and then getting things such as my direct deposit set up. I also was briefed on what I would be doing in the job, which will be to assist with the network management of the client of the project I am working on.

Throughout the first week or so I have met many people who I had only conversated with over email, text or on the phone, so being able to actually meet them face to face was something that I am very happy about. Even though I am only a week in, based off of everyone I have met and how things have been going, I am extremely excited to continue on this journey, and to learn as much as I possibly can.
