

If I had a company, I would definitely implement that all companies no matter the amount of employees to have cybersecurity requirements. By doing this, it helps keep the security and privacy of anyone's company no matter the size. With company policy, I would make sure that only devices that are issued to an employee are connected to the network. Within the awareness aspect, I would make sure that everybody takes a certification course that involves the different aspects that involves how people attack and try to receive information through different companies. Within the certification course, depending on the employees position in the company, if they are involved in a higher level, then there will be higher training for that individual. In the education aspect, all companies should be educated and have briefings about the security of the company and what are some factors that can help limit the possible security risks. While all companies have technology, no outside technology that has not been approved by the company should be used for any of the company's work. In my company, I would definitely impose fines to the companies that are not compliant to any rules of the company. I feel so heavy about this situation, because in news articles you hear so much about the privacy of companies information being leaked, because of employees that are not aware of certain security issues within the company. Also, depending on what particular company is, if information about the company is not securely monitored or employees are not taking the initiative to protect the information, then the company could be at risk for more security issues.
