1. Think about the job postings you submitted for Part 1, and the knowledge, skills, and abilities you'll need. Did these jobs match what you had in mind for your dream job? Did you find your dream job? Describe the similarities and differences.
2. From the 3 job postings you found, choose one job you want the most, and use the list of skills required for the job of interest. Identify skills you already have and identify skills you are still building or need more experience performing. Discuss options to sharpen or learn the skills you will need to gain.

These jobs matched the skills needed which is interesting to me because I never considered looking at analyst jobs until now. I didn't necessarily find my dream job but I found jobs that interested me a lot and made me think about the path towards becoming an analyst rather than a Healthcare administrator. Similarities include a lot of the personal skills, including time management, communication, problem solving, being able to assess situations quickly and accurately. Some of the skills for one of the behavior analyst jobs that I looked at on Indeed included “Strong leadership skills, and strong oral and written communication skills” I feel as though I can be quite strong with these two skills however my communication could always be improved especially when appealing to a large audience and to many different people with different backgrounds. Learning to effectively communicate on a large scale is difficult and takes time, but public speaking seminars, videos, and classes can help, including reading about literacy and communication skills.
