

As this semester is coming to a close it's getting harder and harder to bunker down and study. The last week on campus I was lucky enough to not have any major tests or assignments due. I truly got to spend a great week with the friends I made on campus before heading out to break. Now after thanksgiving break I have to buckle down and start studying for finals. I have been studying more towards the end of the semester than in the beginning especially for exams. My studying habits have remained the same, study sheets, flash cards, and video recaps. From class to class even from unit to unit these vary.

The 14 weeks at college were definitely a surprise. I didn't think we'd make it through thanksgiving. This semester I found the people in my learning community very helpful. They truly support each other and help each other out whether it's when things are due, where things are, how to do something, or just random questions about our campus and college in general. I also found that I love doing work at the web and you never know who you're going to see there. One thing I found helpful in the beginning of the semester was doing work with my friends in our floor lounge. But, the lounges were closed due to covid and once reopened I could never focus there. I definitely can only do work with certain people. One thing I wish I knew 14 weeks ago, don't be afraid to put yourself out there, everyone is in the same boat and has the same questions.
