

Given the previous two weeks of reading, I believe we can all agree that our legal system has difficulties keeping pace with advancements in technology. With that as a backdrop, what should our legislative bodies (Local, State, Federal) be doing to respond more rapidly to these advancements? What techniques/policies/procedures would you deploy to help close this gap?

As technology advances, we are focused on making sure these technologies are safe and efficient when being used. Yet in our government, we fail to keep outline how technology interacts with our legal system. Allowing us to make proper decisions without falsely justifying a situation as overwhelming or underwhelming. Our three branches of government should allow cybersecurity to have more importance in dedicating the future of laws and how people may result doing these things. While they would have mainly an influence in the cyberspace more over the economical laws and such. Have a half-annual meeting to discuss the developments of outstanding innovations or advancements to recognize the possible risk that could affect the current country or the future of the country. Currently, we have old heads with no intellect on cyber matters, who are deciding how to “control” the situations. This is the big problem and where it all starts for America, can't make a change when the people are relying on people who can't even open their phones. We need to make sure to have a diverse roster of people that can advise these implementations to the government as we all know young people catch on to a lot of things of trendy/innovative ideas that may bloom into something bigger. Yet we still need older people who are able to provide wisdom and experience to address the reality of the situations. Diversity is what will help us realize the advancements and deal with them effectively as these different minds can come to agreeance overtime over what could invade others' rights, Tech laws should be proposed more often as it becomes more and more of our daily life, the more serious it needs to be taken, we should keep improving our understanding of the interactions. Keeping the gap growing between our dinosaur system of perceiving laws, will hurt the integrity of our justices system. If not the problems within the country could beyond our government and leak to international levels where other countries will be harmed.
