Week 10: Journal Entry

I got a three out of nine on the Social Media Disorder scale. I think the questions were very relevant to what a person who uses social media regularly may experience. For some of the questions, I had to think about them very carefully. However, I think my score can be considered low as it is less than five out of nine. I also think that the test can be inaccurate as more detailed data is not analyzed to figure out if a person has an addiction to social media. I think that the different patterns found in the world tend to vary due to their personal background. People around the world tend to have different experiences with technology and social media. Furthermore, people involved in cybersecurity groups tend to have different motivations compared to other members of online cybersecurity groups.
