Answer:

I feel that the policy for bug bounties, also known as (VDPS) is a great idea, the reason behind this claim is that it gives small organizations that find difficulties, competing with originations such as JP Morgan , for security professionals a ease so they don't have to shutdown within 6months due to a large security breach within the organization. Furthermore, I feel that these bounty's, can help the field of cybersecurity as a whole, due to the fact individuals are competing amongst one another for bounties, and vulnerabilities within different organizations. This also helps organization, because most of the times the bounties that are found within the organization, is one that was looked passed as a threat. Even though there are factors that are needed to be taken into consideration, such as some code base vulnerabilities that can be found with tools such as Metasploit, which should involve no cost. Although there are still issues, with the ease that criminals can monetize a vulnerability in a particular sector. I still feel that bug bounty researchers, will help benefit organizations in both private and public sectors.
