While watching the video Hacker Rates 12 Hacking Scenes In Movies And TV | How Real Is It? | Insider i found it very interesting. It showed the gap between how Hollywood portrays hacking versus how it really looks like in reality. In the video they show hacking as a big scheme where you can visually see what they're doing on huge monitors and how they are fighting against different defenses which is very dramatic and not real. These movies influence how the public views hacking as something very quick and visually driven. For those in the public who do not have a background in cybersecurity they do not know that in reality hacking is something very tedious and methodical. Media needs to use more accurate examples when describing hacking.
