

Revenge

Political

For money

Recognition

Entertainment

Boredom

Multiple reasons

This reason why I have my list in this order is because I feel like most hackers decide to hack because it's happened to them either once or a numerous number of times. Next, I think "political" because some politicians may even go above and beyond to either bash their opponent or just to win the race so they could get someone to hack into their opponent's system. After political I have "for money" because if someone ask for you to hack someone for a huge amount of money you may consider it. Following for money I put for "recognition" because there are people in the world who just wants to be recognized for something so if they have to hack to receive some type of fame they will. I think after recognition it should be "entertainment" because overall there are people in the world who just feel like taking others personal information is cool. Coming after entertainment should be "boredom" because people may just feel like they have nothing else to do in the world but hack. Finally, I put for multiple reasons because there may be numerous amounts of reasons someone may feel they need to hack.
