The article "Social Cybersecurity: An Emerging National Security Requirement" by Lt. Col. David M. Beskow and Dr. Kathleen M. Carley discusses social cybersecurity as an important part of national security showing how it affects all levels of warfare. The authors explain that social cybersecurity is the study of how changes in technology impact human behavior and social cultural and political results. They point out that today's technology allows both government and non-government groups to quickly change information which can shift how battles are fought. This tactic aims to weaken trust in national institutions and social values making it crucial for military leaders to understand and tackle these new challenges. The article stresses the importance of social cybersecurity in maintaining the unity and strength of societies against growing cyber threats.
