

I am doing well in literature sociology and health 101. To me these are my easiest classes. I have a schedule so I am able to see all my work and start the assignments early. Each of these classes take about hour of study time. The class I needed most assistant with was my chemistry lecture. I was having a hard time grasping the information. Changes I have made was more study time with my chemistry and I used more YouTube to help me as well.

Coming into college I really didn't have any expectations I was just really excited about living on my own for the very first time. My college experience is a little different because I thought I would be at parties and making new friends but I enjoyed being in the house and being alone. Nothing has surprised me this semester because I've heard stories and I've witnessed most stuff about school before I came to college. One of my hardest challenges about commuting to class is having to get up extra early to be on time period I don't have any other challenges besides getting up early.

Coming into college I did a lot of research about my major so I knew pretty much everything I needed to know. I did a lot of research beforehand so I would not be shocked or completely lost when I heard the information. I am just trying to figure out how I'm going to get through the science portion of my major that is a weak spot of mine. I am mainly focused on my nursing major because this is what I want to pursue and this is what I want my career to be so no there is no other major I want to learn more about.

Luckily, I haven't ran into any problems or challenges yet that I didn't know how to figure out on my own. I have a wonderful roommate she has helped me with my chemistry work and homework. She is a public health major so she has helped me a lot in my nursing field. She stays up late at night with me making sure I understand the work we have completed. she keeps me on a good track with my work. I haven't signed up or attended any club meetings my schedule is already hectic enough and I didn't want to put any extra on my plate that I couldn't handle. Next semester I am looking forward to checking out the clubs since I know how to balance my school work now.
