Dr. Leigh Armistead,

Faking your identity online, sharing passwords, cyberbullying, and using torrent services or copyrighted images are all examples of potentially illegal or unethical online activities. Faking your identity online can be done for various reasons, but it can be a form of fraud or deception. Sharing passwords can violate terms of service agreements and compromise the security of personal information. Cyberbullying can cause serious harm to individuals and can be considered a form of harassment or even a crime. Using torrent services or downloading copyrighted images without permission from the owner is a form of piracy and can lead to legal consequences. It is important to be aware of the potential harm these activities can cause and to avoid engaging in them. Instead, individuals should respect the privacy and rights of others online and follow ethical and legal guidelines for internet use.
