

I think that my mid semester is going well from what I thought it would be . This first semester term is a wild ride, especially my class's . I am doing quite well in my advertising society class , Intro to sociology and my visual communication . I am taking my time going over the study material and taking notes when needed as well going over with my classmates too . But there is a class that I am having trouble with and that is my chemistry class. I'm looking forward to making changes to study better and be better prepared for this class and change my grade in it .

When I first came to Old Dominion I had expectations that I would need to become this student who needed to be inside and study hard . But after being here for a few months I see that you can be like this but I have found time to hang out and keep up with my school work . My expectations have changed a lot after seeing that . Something that has really surprised me so far is seeing how much work you get from your classes . In one class you might not have any work but in another class you might have a lot but I have managed to keep a balance for the work in my classes. But if there's one thing I have to say that is a challenge since I moved away to college it's getting up in the morning for my 8am class. If I had to pick something that was the easiest challenge that I overcame it would be to keep up with homework .

Something that I have learned about my major is that it's a lot of science classes to become a (DPT) Doctor of Physical Therapy. My feelings for my major have pretty much been the same. I am ready for the challenges that come with taking this major . There is no other major that I would like to take at all .

One problem I have encountered this semester is losing my id card. I did have to keep going to the card center and pay for my second id card. I did have one student who is in my class help me this semester study for upcoming exams and do homework . I have not attend a meeting for a club or anything only because I haven't found anything that seems that I want to join.