Illegal Works in Cyberspace

According to the article's author, there are numerous illegal things people do unknowingly. The author listed 11 things that people unknowingly do, but I will discuss five that are serious and unethical. The five illegal things I think are the most malicious are faking your identity online, collecting information about children, illegal searches on the internet, bullying and trolling, and Sharing Passwords, Addresses, or Photos of Others.

On the internet, it is inevitable to meet people online. Cyberspace is filled with so many people and information that it is easy to fake who you are. I think this can harm both victims: the person with the stolen identity and the person being deceived by an anonymous person. There have been many incidents where people lost their lives or were exploited because of fake profiles. Collecting information about children is very weird and strange for people on the internet. What do people do with that information? Why do they want it? Where does it go? There are so many questions that spark. Illegal searches are another thing I find profound. as I mentioned earlier, there is so much information online, and if that information gets into the hands of someone who indulges in illegal searching, that can be dangerous. Bullying and trolling is such an unethical thing to do. There are many children and young adults who commit suicide because of the things said and done to them online. Lastly, I think I should share passwords, addresses, or photos of others online. It is a dangerous thing to do, especially sharing your address with strangers. While playing video games, many people are exploited, especially by being doxed through their IP address. People can also hack into network systems that way and gain password access.
