

Course Reflection

One position that I took on the case analysis 2 paper with the GPRD and the ethics of the data mining in search of any clues or anything that could lead them to individuals who have interest in joining the ISIS. When it came to writing that part I did not exactly agree with everything I was saying but that assignment definitely helped me to be able to look from a different perspective, which in the cybersecurity world working with different people from different backgrounds might not always agree with any and everyone that I work with but being able to come up with an argument for a side opposite of what I would personally agree with but using the information that was given to me in order to come up with the answer was an interesting task. A new topic that I learned was Ubuntu, originally as a cybersecurity major, I only knew it in using the operating system linux, but learning about it as a need for the community was different in the cybersecurity field you can always depend on someone else whether it be a fellow coworker or even a superior or even someone below. In computers there is always something to learn from someone and no matter how long you have been in computers you can always learn something new from someone else and that does not just go for work but in life in general you can always learn something new from someone else in life maybe from someone who has been where you have been or is where you want to be at and you can take advice from them as no matter where you are in life there is always going to be someone there that can Help that is really something that I can take with me anywhere I go in life. Lastly, a perspective of whistleblowing being a good thing for the longest when it came to whistleblowing I always pictured it as someone who was a former employee and was upset with the way they were fired or something in that nature and decided to tell the companies secrets, but I can see how sometimes there is a need for there to be a whistle blower it may be needed for the company to get back on track to what the morals and ideals that the company had started with.
