

Writing Spaces 2

Before reading about primary research I thought they were a document cited in a paper the most often. I now know that it can be something the writer does to gain a deeper understanding on a topic. It can mean the other choose also, however in this kind of research paper it is data or answers to questions the writer conducts. This quote made it clear how primary research is different, “ The ultimate goal on conducting primary research is to learn about something new that can be confirmed by others and to eliminate our own biases in the process.” I liked that the textbook broke down each of the three way to conduct the research so I the reader knows how to conduct my own research. Another quote that I found very helpful and informational in the this reading was, “ The primary research process is quite similar to the writing process.” This makes the whole research process fell less daunting and more relatable. I think the best approach for my research paper is conducting an interview with a kindergarten teacher. This is the best way for me to conduct my primary research so I can get the answers to my questions about the field.

Questions:

1. Would someone use all three ways to collect their primary research (a survey, observing, or an interview) in one paper or is it best to just use one?
2. For your paper if we are interviewing someone should we give them a false name like the text talks about?
