

Journal Entry 15

I think his beginning is typical of an aspiring cybersecurity career. Out of school you usually get put into organizations that are looking for some sort of IT support. Also, applying to the digital forensics team on a whim is another similarity; a lot of cybersecurity students and graduates I know or know of tell a similar story of having to bite the bullet and apply for something, even if you don't fit the criteria 100%. However, his resume of having worked at a top accounting firm is one big difference in the typical cybersecurity expert's and Davin's career pathway.
