

Often in times of understanding what's going on within the digital space or not media portrays cybersecurity as extremely dramatized and exaggerated. Most of the time when movies portray how cybersecurity works it has so little going but so much being shown or random jargon that's not actually true but or more or less just selling the action. They can show a character staring at a screen full of text traditionally with a black background with green text within a terminal-like application, the character is just typing away or scripting at 200 wpm only to cut away to something else that they hacked or more than likely to them messing up a couple more times until they get it done suddenly.
