Two theories that relate to this letter are social network theory and social identity theory. Social network theory studies the relationships between individuals and their connections with each other. If a data breach occurred, this theory would be useful to understand how the information spread through social networks not only affects individuals but also organizations and communities connected to those networks. On the other hand, social identity theory explores how individuals categorize themselves in a social group, which influences their behavior as well as their attitude. If a data breach were to occur, the personal information of the individuals involved within these social groups could be compromised, leading to feelings of vulnerability and insecurity.
