In my list the first and most important motive is money, there is a lot of money that can be made from doing cybercrime. For an example you could extort a lot of money out of Walmart is if you could hack into their system. The next motive on my list is recognition, with this people just want to make a name for themselves. One time a hacking group shut down Sony's online server just because they could, and they wanted to prove a Point. The third motive on this list is political, with this the person running for office or anyone could be trying to get some dirt out on one of the people running for office. The fourth one in the list is revenge, I say this because people have grudges against people and want to ruin their life. The fifth one is political because this is a way to get information on the other candidate, so you can get an edge on the competition. The sixth one is entertainment, I can see why someone would do it for entertainment, but it doesn't really make sense. I say this because there are plenty other reasons why like money and power. The last one is boredom, just like I previously said why when there are plenty of other reasons.
