CONTRACTARIANISM

After giving it some thought about whether I would want to be in this environment where this cancer cure is introduced or present, I would have to say that I wouldn't want to be in this type of environment. It was a hard decision because when it could benefit people who have cancer but it's also a con because these people who have the cure and end up having this DGD reaction may cause harm to the other people in the society. But looking at it from the perspective of someone who has cancer and is looking to get a cure it's not always guaranteed that you're going to act out and react to the drug so that may encourage a person to decide to be in a type of environment. A society that doesn't have the cure for cancer may have a more just distribution of benefits than harm because a person who has the cure can harm someone else while those who doesn't have a cure but have cancer can't harm anybody but themselves so to speak. A person can argue that since there isn't a cure for cancer than a person who has cancer and dies their family members may be so hurt from the loss that they may want to take their own life so it is the same as if a person suffered from DGD and took someone else's life. And they can argue that not everyone will suffer from DGD and react this way. Even though there may be different approaches when it comes to handling people who react to the cancer cure in a bad way, I still would not want to take that chance of someone hurting or even killing me because they reacted wrong.

If I was in Lynn's position, I would want to have the Dilg center controlled by people like her with DGD. Strictly because the people who work there knows what everyone is going through so there would be less judging. The contractarian reasoning helps her reconcile herself the future she sees for herself because of the unspoken laws that are in place so people can live together smoothly. So, people who suffer from DGD working at the Dilg center for other DGD people is "written" under these laws so the world will operate smoothly. It's almost like the people who have DGD want ones qualified to work in those centers just like the hospitals only people qualified to work at hospitals who have the knowledge about that kind of stuff should work in hospitals. And like how you don't have a soccer coach coaching basketball I, it kind of goes hand-in-hand, you should have a basketball coach coaching basketball and a person who has DGD working in a center with people who have the same reaction to the cure for cancer. That's just how society I works and what you say keeps it running skills. This all goes back to this "contract" that is put in place but isn't written out entirely it's just this thing that everyone knows.
