

Starting off, the number one motive that makes sense to me is money. You cannot do anything in this world without money and money is the driving force for a lot of things. This makes the most sense because you are providing for yourself. Second on my list is 'multiple reasons.' I would have this first but for multiple reasons you could have something good on one hand then on the other the reasoning could be bad. For example, one of your reasons could be money and the other is revenge which does not balance out. Third on the list is political motives. It is politics everywhere and everyone wants to get their point across, so they take the measures. Most of the time it is not harmful, so it is third on my list. Coming in at number 4 on my list is revenge. Even though this motive is the most dangerous in my opinion because when someone is hurt by something there is no limit to what they can do, so it makes sense to why people do it even though it is not good at all. Next on my list at number 5 is boredom. Committing crimes because your boredom is just simply not smart at all. There are many other things you could do if you are bored. On to the next at number 6 is entertainment. I feel like entertainment and boredom kind of correlate in this context. As said before committing a crime because you are bored or have no entertainment is crazy. There are so many different things you could do like picking up a hobby or something rather than committing crimes because you lack entertainment. Last on my list is recognition. I struggled ranking this but committing crimes for recognition is dumb when you can try to get recognition for something positive.

Sources

Lovejoy, B. (2021, July 19). Man behind LinkedIn scraping said he grabbed 700m profiles "for fun." 9to5Mac. <https://9to5mac.com/2021/07/19/man-behind-linkedin-scraping/>